

Real Estate Strategic Outlook: France

French Economic Outlook

Global geopolitical volatility weighs on sentiment

After spending most of 2025 in political turbulence, we are seeing the effects pass through to the real estate market in France in the form of weak occupier and investor activity. This year is unlikely to bring much improvement, with GDP growth in 2026 forecast to remain subdued at less than 1%, as global geopolitical volatility is layered over weakening domestic fundamentals as we approach the Presidential elections in 2027. On the positive side, France's energy mix, with a high proportion of nuclear, is softening the impact of the conflict in Iran on energy prices, so we may see less of an erosion of real incomes than in European markets with a heavier reliance on fossil fuels. Demand conditions may normalise in the medium term but this is partly dependent on a stabilisation of the domestic political environment.

Pockets of opportunity in slowing market

Broad market slowdown underway for logistics and offices

The logistics sector has, until recently, been a strategic focus. However, take-up in Q1 2026 was significantly down on previous years, particularly in Paris, and for the first time we are seeing incentives being used to support headline rents. The slowdown can be attributed to a combination of domestic political uncertainty alongside the early introduction of a 'small parcel' tax this year (other European countries have until the end of the year to enact similar legislation).

With availability now at 8% in Lille and just under 10% in Paris,¹ rental growth in the short term is likely to decelerate sharply in these markets. More Southern markets, including Lyon, Marseille, and the Atlantic coast are better placed to weather a period of weak demand as vacancy is lower.

The medium-term outlook for the logistics market, however, is much more promising. Assuming some improvement in both the domestic and the global political situation, conditions may be ripe for a return in consumer and consequently logistics occupier demand. E-commerce penetration in France is still below the European average, leaving ample room for growth. Logistics availability is also concentrated in second-hand assets, while quality space remains scarce, so any resurgence in demand is likely to place upward pressure on rents for space which aligns with occupier demand.

Office demand has also slowed markedly going into 2026. Rental growth, which averaged over 6% p.a. in the years immediately following the covid-19 pandemic, is now going into reverse in some submarkets including the Western Business District. Given the weakness in demand is particularly marked for floorplates above 5,000 sqm, and assets which are non-compliant with ESG regulation, our focus is on refurbishment strategies for smaller office space in CBD or Central Parisian submarkets where availability is lower and occupier demand is focused.

PBSA on the radar for international investors

The purpose-built student accommodation (PBSA) market in France has reached a turning point in terms of attracting international capital. Until 2019, investment in PBSA had not exceeded 2% of total investment volumes, whereas over the past two years, the proportion has doubled.² While most opportunities still require taking some development risk, pursuing stabilised assets is now a possibility.

Paris remains highly undersupplied overall but as PBSA does not currently fall under regulation limiting rental growth in the residential sector, there is a healthy pipeline of development. In this context, operators in weaker micro-locations are sometimes wrong-footed in targeting overly ambitious rents on opening. Focusing on affordable product is likely to unlock rental outperformance as the fastest growth in the market is currently achieved by the bottom quintile of assets according to monthly rent.

Asset management opportunities in hotels sector

Hotels have long been a strong performer in France and with regulation limiting conversion of residential stock in most central arrondissements, the pipeline of completions over the next five years lags expected growth in visitor numbers by a wide margin. Despite the presence of many established international hotel operators in Paris, the market remains largely fragmented. Opportunities to target and upgrade poorly managed existing stock could therefore realise attractive returns.
